Although the Konica III offered better lens and shutter combinations, a larger and brighter viewfinder, and a self-timer, it's most distinctive feature is the left handed "thumb wind" film advance on the front of the camera. The Konica III is the only camera I know of that uses a film advance like this.

The Konica III was the third model in a series of fixed-lens rangefinder cameras. The Konica III is a solidly constructed, heavy camera that is capable of producing excellent photographs. It uses a left-handed two-stroke trigger to advance the film and tension the shutter, reminiscent of the older Zeiss-Ikon Tenax square-format cameras of the late 1930s.
